Histological changes in the spinal ligaments of the embryonic chick during their in vitro ossification were studied using a chemically defined medium. The ligaments were separated from the dorsal spine, cultured in Eagle's MEM with or without 20% chicken embryo extract, and were observed after 0, 1, 2, and 3 weeks. It was observed that both the anterior and the posterior longitudinal ligaments calcify significantly during the first week of culture. These changes were not evident when the ligaments were cultured in medium alone. Histologically, the cells at the front of the ligament transformed into bone-like cells and proliferated. Bone matrix formed over the ligament, resulting in a concentration of bone matrix at the ligament margin. The ligaments formed a bone-like structure in the shape of the ligament, and they calcified both internally and externally.[Experiences with the application of carotid endarterectomy for patients with cerebral hemodynamically significant carotid stenosis]. Carotid endarterectomy (CEA) is the most common vascular surgery performed in the Netherlands. A significant number of patients is scheduled for CEA on an elective basis. In view of the high perioperative risk, these procedures are regarded as high-risk. It is therefore essential to minimize this risk. The present article presents the authors' experiences regarding CEA.
