Superman Action Figure.Q: Javascript, why does this work? I have a javascript object named console that stores various debugging messages. Inside the constructors of a few classes, I have this code: `console.log(this.get("text"))`; If `get("text")` is not defined in the constructor, it will throw an error. My question is why does this code work?

`console.log(this.get("text"))`; A: 'get' is a method defined on a prototype of the 'this' object, which I believe is the Function class (you're probably inheriting the methods from the `Function.prototype` object). If you're passing a function as the first argument to console.log(), then this will refer to the context of the function object. Since Function.prototype.get is not defined, and you don't pass a function as the first argument, the method is undefined and doesn't throw an exception. In other words, this.get is a javascript scoped version of get(this) A 15-
